BRITISH NEUTRALITY IN CHINA

FRENCH DISSATISFACTION The refusal to allow the French ironclad Triomphante to refit at Hongkong is sharply criticised by some of the Paris papers. The Temps infers that in the English view France and China are regularly at war though without any declaration on either side, and that the rules of neutrals in wars between civilised nations are to be strictly enforced against France. England, in short, treats France and China on exactly the same footing, though France has studiously avoided hostilities at treaty ports and has not visited neutral vessels at Formosa, whereas China has been fortifying the mouth of the Shanghai river, profiting by English materials at Shanghai, and despatching munitions by neutrals to Formosa. The Temps doubts, moreover, whether the English officials will prevent as provided by the Act of 1870 ?" The Tolographe anticipates serious embarrass

The constructors of the English navy prefer to strip the ends of the ship of their side plating, in order to get more thickness of armour to protect the magazines, the boilers, and the guns. This difference of opinion is due to a radical divergence of view as to the primary function of iron plating. According to the armoured-enders the first function of iron plating is to keep the ship affeat. Not at all, say their opponents. Armour is primarily required to protect the boilers, the magazines, and the guns. Keeping the ship affect is secondary. When projectiles can be hurled resources to squander any of the available displacement in armouring the non-vital portions of the ship. You can always keep a ship affoat and "fightable" by water-tight compartments and a shelving deck. Here the naval officer joins a seaway a ship with pierced ends would be sure to capsize, and that, therefore, until they have tested their conclusions by actual experiment, naval officers will feel profoundly uncomfortable into action. This is a very serious matter, and one which demands the careful attention of the naval authorities. It is as important that our sailors should have faith in their ships as that the ships Felippe da Luz, a printer, was charged with themselves should be as strong as iron and steel squatter. Some interesting particulars concerning the loudly applauded at intervals and at the close of trade between British India and Nepaul are his address. furnished in the Report on the Foreign Trade | There is (says the St. Louis Globs) a new of the North-West Provinces. The character of beauty in society this season over whom all are the trade with Nepaul differs considerably from raving. She comes from the land of Mrs. Langthat with Tibet. She has a pretty mouth, and forest produce. Like Tibet, it receives from dazzling white teeth, and an aristocratic little India cotton, metal wares, and a few articles of luxury which the Indian and European arts de fine, crinkley hair, as bright as spun gold. With vise in addition to tobacco, sugar, and salt, which last it receives from India as well as from Tibot. The total trade registered in 1883-4 represented an increase over the preceding year of 1,648,227 rupees in imports, and of 353,646 rupees in exports, excluding treasure, and it may be mentioned that Nepaul sells up a great deal more her jewels and ball toilets, the city will be ringthan it buys in return. It is computed that the Khatmandhu Durbar derives an annual profit woman. Mr. and Mrs. Helyar have been give from this trade of 28; lakhs, or more than a many dinners and entertainments, and one pretty quarter of a million sterling. The mode of carparty given very soon after their arrival was by rying on the trade is described in the following the Assistant-Secretary of State and Mrs. John quarter of a million sterling. The mode of carpassage:-"Transactions in all articles except Davis. Transactions in wood are concluded with the Nepaulese officials direct; and for rice engagements are made with the Teraioultivators, confess their faith as readily as the world conwho are usually advanced about half the value fesses its unbelief. Canon Liddon told a story of Durbar for the land they cultivate, a practice his host. Canon Liddon did not give any hint very similar to what is followed by the growers wherewith to identify the reviler, and he was of indige and poppy in the North-West Provinces, who, with about half the money that they ever has more importance historically and receive from the indigo manufacturers, pay off biographically than the Canon confessed. indigo. Thus, of the goods imported, the whole of the value of timber and about half the value of rice go to the coffers of the Durbar, and of these sums little probably returns for the purchase of Indian goods excepting a few articles of luxnry." These facts throw a significant light on the wealth of the Nepaulese Government, and on some of the reasons for its exclusive policy. A free and unrestricted trade would benefit the Nepaulesa people, but not their rulers, whose aim is to save money, purchase or manufacture arms, and wait on the chapter of accidents to profit in the future by their present thrift and At a meeting in some marshes near Norwich

But all this is mere destructive, not constructive criticism. Mr. Wilde must give us something else if he is to maintain his position as a dress-improver. The Army and Navy Register states that Procorrespondence with Admiral Jones, of the British navy, with reference to the introduction of a poisonous air-bomb he has invented, and which he claims will revolutionise all modern warfare. The membirs of M. Andrieux, ex-Prefect of Police, are now appearing in his paper, La Lique. Some of his revolutions are of the most piquant and interesting character. He describes, with much humour, the aystem of keeping "dossiers," which is in vogue at the Prefecture of Police Everybody, even the Prefect himself, has one of those curious bundles of documents, which, as M Andrienx says, "not only tell all about you, but also what everybody else has been saying for or against you." It was the poetical age of reason. It was still the fashion for mon of letters to appear before the public in verse, but prose was usurping the place of poetry. Artistic elegance and scholarly form replaced the varied fancy, the exuberant imagination of the alder English school. Poetry subsided into an argumentative, didactic, useful character. It grew classical and courtly, ombellished familiar objects and every-day events. But it consed to be "intellectual opium eating." It was kept in touch with all the movements of the day-scientific, political, religious, social. And this picture of contemporary life was not conveyed through any literary medium. The generation which placed Roman beroes on the stage in perukes and buckles, or adorned the hand that wrote upon the wall at Belshazzar's feast with ring and ruffle, did not seek the disguise of-classical or medizeral costume Its active interests were represented in a simple straightforward style in the ordinary dress of the day. The sublimity and greatness of postry disappeared, but it was instinct with national life .- Edichungh He-
